Not illustrated. 1846 Excerpt: ...ridicule and perhaps a more fearful opposition still of the whole community around them, and by stemming which they suffer the loss of all things. This is the literal crucifying of the old man with the affections and lusts,--a fighting with principalities and powers. But in the church at home, how different is the state of things. Here the members are taught from infancy the Scripture principles by which the moral conduct should be governed; their consciences are trained to discern and to acknowledge what is right; they become accustomed to moral restraints and conform to the average standard of morals in the community around them. To this conformity public sentiment and a regard for their own character and success in life bind them. The one is called to contend with bad passions and habits which have been fostered and indulged all his life; the other with passions and habits curbed and rectified by right instruction, by conscience, and by example. It is ruin to the worldly prospects and enjoyments of the one to adopt the standard of morals and manner of life, to which public sentiment alone forces up the other. The one seems to have no foundation whatever for moral principle or moral conduct but Irving piety; while the other may be irreproachably moral in every relation of life, and yet all of it have its origin in something else besides piety. The one may fall repeatedly into gross sin, and yet give more evidence of having been renewed by the Spirit, and of habitually struggling against sin, than the other who never fell in a similar way at all. Take away from our church members all the supporting and sustaining influence exerted upon them by good principles early instilled, good habits early formed, and a highly moral public sentiment ever acting upon th...
