Not illustrated. 1846 Excerpt: ...not for you. You see I am perambulating before a female. Frank. I would crave but a word with you. Fid. Speak in time, then, porter; for otherwise I do not love to answer you; and be as brief as you can, good porter. Frank. I pray you, sir, what gentlewoman is this? Fid. Certes, porter, I serve a gentleman. That gentleman is father to this gentlewoman. This gentlewoman is a maid. This maid is fair. And this fair maid belongeth to the Exchange. And the Exchange hath not the like fair maid. Now, porter, put this all together; and tell me what it spells. Frank. I promise you, sir, you have posed me. Fid. Then you are an ass, porter! 'Tis the fair Maid of the Exchange. Frank. Her name, I pray you, sir? Fid. Her name, porter, requires much poeticality in the subscription; and no less judgment in the understanding. Her name is Phillis, not Phillis that same dainty lass that was beloved of Amyntas; nor Phillis she that doated on that comely youth Demophoon; but this is Phillis, that most strange Phillis, the flower of the Exchange. Phil. What, would that porter anything with me? Frank. Yes, mistress. Since by chance I meet you here, I'll tell you, tho' it not concerns myself, What I this morning saw. There is a gentleman, One Master Goulding, the youngest of three brothers, They call him Frank. This man lies very sick. I being at his house, perchance, inquired What his disease was, of a servant there, Who said, the doctors cannot tell themselves; But in his fits he ever callson Love, And prays to Love for pity, and then names you, And then names Love again; and then calls Phillis, And sometimes starts, and would forsake his bed, And being asked whither, says he would go to Phillis. My business call'd me hence; but I heard say His friends do...
