They took their places under the roof of the open shed, and when there were signs of a dark, heavy cloud drawing near, the kite was sent up. But what Mr. Franklin hoped for did not happen, though the kite flew high. Another cloud soon came sailing past, and then another. Yet still nothing happened. Mr. Franklin was getting discouraged, when a particularly dark cloud approached the kite and surrounded it. And then! The fibers of the string stood out in all directions. As the watcher noted it, he touched his knuckle to the key at the end, and felt a shock, the very thing for which he was hoping. Again he touched it, and again came the shock. How delighted he was; he had proved to himself that lightning is electricity.
