Urban Energy Handbook: Good Local Practice Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development

Cities in OECD countries consume 60 to 80 per cent of total energy. This causes local pollution and contributes significantly to global environmental damage. This publication, based on more than 40 case studies, underlines the role cities may play in promoting less energy-intensive forms of urban development and management. It describes some of the more significant innovations which are now being used in cities in OECD countries, in particular managerial, technical, and institutional options. It also proposes ways and means to improve the coordination of energy policies and the integration of environmental considerations in policy making.
